Up to 70% of malaria cases in endemic countries are thought to be due to inoculation of parasites from an earlier patent infection rather than natural infection of the current infection [@pone.0023161-Paludo1]. Additionally, asymptomatic parasitaemia is common in endemic areas and may confound the detection of the efficacy of antimalarials used in drug trials. For example, an asexual parasitemia of >20% was detected in 5% to 60% of study subjects in African clinical trials, which makes the interpretation of efficacy studies difficult [@pone.0023161-Guyatt1]. Therefore, a high parasitaemia at enrolment or presence of gametocytes at enrolment may represent a challenge in the conduct of antimalarial drug efficacy trials in endemic areas. As with any study, the design and conduct of a clinical trial are governed by ethical, regulatory, and scientific principles. The principles of "informed consent" and "patient selection" may pose significant challenges in the conduct of drug trials in endemic settings. The ACPR criteria determined by the WHO do not take into account the possibility of reinfection due to the therapeutic window of antimalarials, since patients with ongoing infections may be asymptomatic and therefore untreated [@pone.0023161-WHO1]. A patient's age plays an important role in treatment decision-making. Malaria in young children is generally serious, and even artemisinin-based combination therapies need to be used as early as possible in uncomplicated cases [@pone.0023161-Sokhna1]. However, this study suggests that a small proportion of patients aged ≥5 years did not have a parasitaemia at enrolment. This may be a good option to select appropriate participants to limit the number of participants enrolled in a trial and also to reduce the burden of the malaria parasite at a research site. For ethical reasons, patients suffering from severe disease should not be enrolled in clinical trials. For healthy, non-pregnant adults, the decision to enroll them or not requires weighing the severity of their disease, the probability of treatment
