The satellite is a co-design by ONT, a major space-tech company headquartered in Beijing, and the China Aerospace Science and Industry Corporation (CASIC), one of the largest aerospace and defense companies in China. It is also ONT's first quantum communication satellite. "We have selected the Japanese Star Tracker because it has the highest precision as well as low latency. Japan has a rich experience with satellite applications such as maritime surveillance, as well as an extensive network of light waves, and we are confident that our newly developed quantum communication satellite will meet the needs of future optical fiber-based quantum communications," said Wen Peng, CEO of ONT. Furthermore, China Aerospace Science and Industry Corporation (CASIC) serves as the satellite's main contractor, with ONT providing the key technology. The satellite is based on the JSC PRC-200 satellite platform, with the innovation being the ON 3da54e8ca3
