Technical Field The present invention generally relates to microfluidic apparatus, systems, and methods for performing one or more assays using microfluidic substrates. Certain embodiments relate to an apparatus, system and/or method for reducing sample-to-sample volume variation when transferring a sample from one microfluidic substrate to another microfluidic substrate. 2. Description of the Related Art There is an increasing demand for integrated bio-chemical sensors in a wide range of applications, such as, for example, mobile or portable devices, point-of-care devices, and various in-vitro diagnostic assays. In in-vitro diagnostic assays, a sample is typically collected from a patient, e.g., via a lancet, then is caused to flow over a reaction zone of the sensor. The sample reacts with biological reagents under controlled conditions to yield a detectable product. After sufficient time, the yield of detectable product can be quantified and related to the concentration of the analyte (e.g., glucose, cholesterol, etc.) in the original sample. In some embodiments, the microfluidic substrates may be part of a disposable assay cartridge, e.g., where various components of an assay are stored. In some embodiments, the cartridge includes a microfluidic substrate. Thus, when samples are to be assayed, the cartridge is typically placed in a different instrument for assaying. In some embodiments, the cartridge may be placed in contact with a portion of the instrument that causes the flow of sample over the reaction zone. Typically, it is desirable to obtain consistent assay results across multiple assays from the same cartridge. In some embodiments, it is desirable to obtain consistent results across multiple cartridges from a single instrument to create a reliable system for manufacturing. However, the trend in the industry is to create smaller and smaller cartridges to reduce the size and cost of such instruments. As such, the ability to transfer a sample from one cartridge to another decreases as the size of the cartridge decreases. In some embodiments, a diluted liquid sample (e.g., 2 drops of blood) may be pipetted to a reaction chamber of a substrate via a capillary tube. The capillary tube moves the liquid sample to a sampling area, where a microfluid
