Download Link Download LinkThe deputy governor of Russia's Tatarstan region has said that the situation in the country is partly due to the spread of Islamist influence, describing it as a "slow-scale genocide". He urged Russian politicians to take the threat of "extremism" seriously. Ruslan Aushev, a nationalist lawmaker who was elected into regional parliament earlier this year, told RIA Novosti that although no one had yet been killed in the country's ongoing clashes with Islamist separatists, the situation was a "shameful development that we need to turn around." At least 15 people have been killed and another 200 wounded in the separatist clashes in the Pervouralsk region of Russia's northernmost republic, the main site of a simmering conflict over control of the region's oil reserves, dating back to the 1920s. READ MORE: Dymytrypy menya (We Must Live) – Cossack Spring in Russia's North – In Russian Words (Photo Essay) The crisis began in April when an opposition group known as the Allahu Akbar (God is Great) Movement initiated an armed insurgency in the region, demanding independence for the territory. Aushev went on to say that although the separatist movement was not a terrorist group, in his view it was linked to Islamic extremism, adding that the conflict was an example of how Russia's "unregistered terrorists" were dividing the nation, opening the way for the spread of "extremism" throughout the country.
