print.Skin findings in hydroxyurea-treated patients with sickle cell disease. Hydroxyurea has proved to be an effective and safe drug for the prevention of stroke in patients with sickle cell disease (SCD). In order to evaluate the safety of hydroxyurea treatment, skin findings were retrospectively assessed in patients who had been receiving the drug for at least 2 years. The current report deals with 26 patients with SCD (14 males, 12 females), aged 6-35 (mean 19) years, who were receiving chronic hydroxyurea therapy for a mean period of 4.8 +/- 3.8 years. The diagnosis of SCD was confirmed by hemoglobin electrophoresis. Skin examinations were performed at the beginning and the end of the study. Three patients had total skin clearing and five had no significant change, while 18 patients showed skin lesions that were neither bluish nor purpuric, and they included: 1) erythematous dermatitis (six cases), including the presence of vesicles and erosions, 2) phlebitis (three cases), including a case of necrolysis, and 3) erythematous and/or purpuric eruptions (seven cases). These lesions were very responsive to the usual therapeutic measures applied, and the drug was withdrawn in a few cases. We conclude that hydroxyurea does not induce any significant increase in skin lesions, which are neither bluish nor purpuric. However, this drug should always be administered with caution, especially to patients with skin lesions.Why Should I Use the Network? Simply put, a network is a file organization or sharing tool. It is a method of sharing files across devices. On any Windows PC, Mac, or Linux-based device, a network drive can be created and accessed. A network drive can be simply a local hard drive or an online drive such as shared drives provided by Dropbox, iCloud, or GoogleDrive. Networks are particularly useful for sharing large files that would be difficult to upload on a particular computer. For example, a network drive can be used to share media files (images, music, movies, etc.) across multiple computers
