The present invention relates generally to computer systems, and more particularly to software for use with a gaming device. With the widespread popularity of computer networks, electronic mail and the Internet and the massive data storage and retrieval capabilities of networked computers, it is not uncommon for a person to generate vast quantities of data, and to repeatedly send or receive same to or from other users. It is not uncommon for such a person to utilize scheduling programs and/or other related software, to determine when data should be transmitted and/or received. Certain gaming devices are sometimes provided with software for initiating communication with another party, and with software for generating scores or other indicia based on gaming activity. While such software may work satisfactorily for its intended purposes, such software may also be burdensome to some users. That is, a user who has transmitted or received a large quantity of data in the past is likely to be annoyed or inconvenienced by the need to perform additional steps to add new data to the data already sent or received. For the foregoing reasons, there is a need for improved methods and systems for use with gaming devices. This invention pertains generally to techniques for generating video information and more specifically to a video display apparatus which is coupled to a remote data base for displaying an encoded personal identification code and/or information regarding the status of the identification code. Current techniques for identifying individuals typically rely on the use of a card or a sticker placed in a given place so that a photo identification of the person is made at a subsequent time. For example, if a person is carrying out a banking transaction at a teller station, the individual would typically be asked to show his or her identification. Such systems, however, require that the individual carrying out the transaction be in close proximity to a photocopying device, usually at a self service teller station. Further, the identification of the person may be
