Need For Conquest is a Turn Based Strategy that mixes both 2D and 3D elements. This unique combination provides a lot of different visual effects, e.g. team leaders and dinosaurs. The game features high-resolution 3D maps which can be imported or recreated using the built-in map editor. In Need for Conquest, you can do virtually anything as your small computer army: build defenses, do research, craft weapons, and conquer your enemy all while on the move and under fire! Need For Conquest includes a map editor that allows you to generate and edit maps as well as to create your own scenarios using the engine's scenario editor. You can also save your maps and scenarios for later or share your creations with the world. Need For Conquest combines unmatched strategy with a free universe and a free map editor, and you get every expansion and update for free, forever. Need For Conquest requires a powerful computer and a substantial game time (90-180 minutes).

for Conquest is essentially Risk. I think if you're interested in Risk, this could be for you. Not to be a copy-cat, but I think the best game for RTS is 7 Wonders, which also blends very nicely into the Risk format. A: RISK: The classic strategy game from Asmadi, i.e. the one based on rolling dice (i.e. Risk, not "RISK" the gamble or a silly, rhyming name). You start with 100 points, and then roll dice to draw (distribute) your tokens among the territories. You can spend the tokens to upgrade your troops or you can spend them to attack a territory of the enemy. Too complex? Don't worry - there are simple versions of RISK as well (but not that simple). For example, when playing on the map of the USA, this might be How to Play Risk: The American Way. EDIT: You can read the rest of the questions about RISK online. Remember: Asmadi's RISK. A: War of the Ring This is in my opinion the closest to Risk in structure. Nowadays there are a lot of modern RTS where you can simply click on a button "field this", etc, so generally it's not so simple, but at first

[1] [ dev/unepic/Unesco.js]( dev/unepic/Unesco.js) ----- x0rz At first glance, the games look great, but I think they are rather self-unfulfillingly discouraging. I am not sure what's the point of judging others. They're only rules to rule others according to them. If I already know about Digital dexterity, combo stacking, luck of the draw, repetition, and entropy, I can sit down and play or study. Give me a good game so I have something to play against. Even the name on this is a disappointment. ----- aero142 At first glance, the games look amazing, but I can't imagine that those cool games played at the end of the show (First Epic, Mystery) were inspired by my own social contract. I could see that the site is the author's first project and maybe improved later, but early on I don't believe that it reflects the essence of what a social contract is. The point of a social contract is to discourage action that deviates from the authentic, agreed upon ones and promote actions that enrich others and improve society. It's the adaptive Nash equilibrium of social spaces. I think that is reflected pretty well in the site. ~~~ kmmh It is. And it has been for centuries. "Best of three" is a relatively new invention, for instance. ----- imperio
