An Online Gaming Experience. Deutsch Fußball Wirtschaft Geschichte Junge Serie Deutschland. Ultrastructural studies of the testicular microcirculation in vas deferens of New Zealand white rabbits. The ultrastructure of the testicular microcirculation in the vas deferens of the New Zealand white rabbits was investigated using scanning and transmission electron microscopy. The luminal surface of the vas deferens was characterized by an anastomosing network of single or complex fenestrae, which were composed of slit-like rings of plate-like endothelial cells. The fenestrae were found to be more numerous at the spermatic segment and at the juncture between the vas deferens and epididymis than at the other locations. In the vas deferens from which the testes were extracted, there was no obvious alteration in fenestrae, except for the perforated capillaries in the dartos muscle. In the vas deferens from which the epididymis was excised, small amounts of fenestrae were formed in the epithelium of the vas deferens in the segment close to the epididymis. The lumen of these fenestrae was very irregular in shape and were usually lacking in smooth muscle cells, as observed in the acini of the epididymis. The absence of a distinct capillary lumen with smooth muscle cells in the proximal segment of the vas deferens may be due to the loss of a structural linkage with the epididymis. In the epididymis, the vascular endothelium was composed of a smooth muscle layer and a single layer of cuboidal epithelial cells. An arteriole was observed from capillaries in the smooth muscle layer of the epididymis. From the luminal surface, the fenestrae were frequently linked together, through interepithelial gaps of various sizes, to form an arteriolar network.
