The utility of the response of Leydig cells to LH stimulation as an independent diagnostic test of Leydig cell function was assessed in 80 infertile males. Leydig cell function (percent rise in serum testosterone and 24-hour urinary excretion of testosterone) was normal in 22% of the infertile men, impaired in 24% and absent in 54%. Leydig cell function was normal in 64% of subfertile men. Patients with abnormal Leydig cell function had severe oligozoospermia (less than 10 million per ejaculate) in 78% of cases. There was no correlation between levels of serum LH or hCG and Leydig cell function. Patients who had undergone a testicular biopsy before examination of Leydig cell function had normal Leydig cell function in all cases except one. Leydig cell function may therefore provide an independent index of Leydig cell function in some forms of male infertility.Paediatric extended field irradiation for medulloblastoma: a retrospective review of treatment related morbidity in 19 years.
