technology of performing a process of installing an additional program into the application program that was not installed in an existing computer system, and particularly to a technology of installing the additional program in an information processing device that is produced at a low cost. In recent years, demands have been increasing for a technology of installing an additional program to a computer system installed in a customer""s premises and executing the additional program. One kind of such application programs is what is called a plug-in. The plug-in is an application program that permits dynamic extensions. When an object in a plug-in is called, the plug-in is executed, and functions of the objects of the application program are dynamically extended. The dynamic extension in the conventional plug-in is a type of an extension from software (hereinafter called xe2x80x9cSWxe2x80x9d) to hardware (hereinafter called xe2x80x9cHWxe2x80x9d). That is, the SW is dynamically executed by using the HW. Examples of the conventional plug-in technology include the technology disclosed in the following patent literatures 1 through 4, for example. In the following patent literature 1, a xe2x80x9csoftware reinstalling apparatusxe2x80x9d is disclosed. In the software reinstalling apparatus, 6d1f23a050
